

Congress Attendance Report — Annual Epilepsy Care Symposium

Date: December 5, 2025 | Author: Rachel Suh

This report summarizes scientific sessions attended and unsolicited conversations held on-site.

Conversation — Fiona Gallagher, MD (Great Lakes Epilepsy Institute)

I caught up with the physician between the Thursday afternoon sessions, and most of what we covered was teaching rather than anything clinical. The institute has taken on two additional fellows this year, so the supervision load has quietly grown without any corresponding change to clinic time. The plan for the fall is to restart a monthly journal club that had lapsed over the winter, ideally with the fellows selecting the papers themselves so that the discussion stays lively. I offered nothing further, since the conversation stayed entirely on training logistics.

Conversation — Victor Salas, MD (Hill Country Neuroscience Institute)

The Thursday session on drug-resistant focal epilepsy drew a full room, and this attending was first to the microphone once the floor opened. During Q&A, described a 17-year-old who failed two ASMs and asked, pointedly, when data below 18 would exist for cenobamate. I thanked the physician for raising it, confirmed that I am able to speak only to the approved adult indication for CNB, and made no comment on use in younger patients. The exchange has been logged for medical information f/u.

Conversation — Katherine Ost, MD (Sonoran Neuroscience Institute)

Our conversation at the Friday morning coffee break was almost entirely logistics. The physician is weighing whether to attend the regional epilepsy meeting in the spring, partly because the travel connections out of Tucson are awkward and partly because two colleagues from the same group have already committed. We compared notes on which sessions tend to fill up early, and I agreed to pass along the registration deadline once it is posted.

Follow-ups have been logged in the interaction system.
